- Four bodies have now been found in the search for the missing following a massive `landslide that destroyed homes in Norway, police have announced.
- Three bodies were discovered on Saturday. The first victim to be found, on Friday, has been named by police as 31-year-old Eirik Grønolen.
- Six people remain missing following the hillside collapse that sent mud into the village of Ask on Wednesday.
- Rescuers are working in freezing conditions to find survivors.
- Police Chief Ida Melbo Øystese told a news conference that while neither the "forces of nature" nor time were on their side there was still a possibility they might find survivors.
- She said there may be air pockets inside some of the buildings buried in the mud that may allow people to survive for a number of days.

- Helicopters and drones spent two days searching the scene. Rescuers began moving into the danger zone on Styrofoam boards; the bright orange boards were laid down on the mud in a domino-effect as rescuers tried to reach the wrecked homes. A giant army vehicle called a "paver", which has a giant steel bridge on which rescuers can move, was also brought in but conditions were not yet good enough for the 50-tonne machine to be deployed

- Rescuers are in a race against time, with only a few hours of daylight in the Norwegian winter to search the area. The conditions have also proved challenging, with temperatures dropping to -1C (30F) and the clay ground proving too unstable for emergency workers to walk on. Police have not given details of the missing, but they are believed to include men, women and children.
- Among them is a woman who was talking to her husband on the phone while walking the dog when the line went dead. Further reports say a 69-year-old woman and a couple and their small child are also missing, as well as a woman in her 50s and her adult son.
- One survivor, Odd Steinar Sørensen, said his daughter was still missing. "I wish I could swap places with" her, he said, adding that he had been told by the police not to give up hope on finding her alive. A 2005 geological survey labelled the area as at high risk of landslides, according to a report seen by the broadcaster TV2. Despite this, the homes were built three years later in 2008
