A Typical British Family:

The typical British family is largely small, consisting of a father, mother and two children. About twenty-five percent of children live in single-parent marriages, with one mom or one dad due to a fairly high number of divorces. Most British children live with their parents at least until they finish school, that is, until they are 18, then many go to College. After College, children prefer to arrange their own lives. Most British families lead quite conservative and somewhat old-fashioned lifestyles. Their apartments are spacious, comfortable. The English are picky in food and prefer the usual traditional English cuisine.

The family lives on a constant routine. They usually get up at seven in the morning, have Breakfast at eight, and go to work and school at eight-thirty. Children return from school at four o'clock, parents come home from work at six and then, at seven o'clock in the evening, the usual family dinner follows.

A Typical Russian family:

In a typical Russian family, there are usually two children-a boy and a girl. Grandparents also participate in the lives of their children and grandchildren, but they usually live separately. In a modern family, both parents are mostly employed. Lives a typical Russian family quite decently, but modestly. Also in families there are Pets.

Similarities of the British and Russian family:

- Families mainly consist of 4 people.
- The older generation lives separately from children and grandchildren.
- It is customary to celebrate holidays.
- There are Pets.
- Common to family education is the education of a full fledged society.

Differences between the British and Russian family:

In British families, children and grandchildren "exile" their relatives in a nursing home, live on a constant routine. The family way, family life, traditions differ in many respects from the Russian family.
