It looks like an ancient temple.

The scenes of riding competitions in the ancient circus are depicted there.

They are miniature marble copies of the ancient statues of the Quirinal Palace in Rome. The Quirinal Palace was the residence of the Italian kings from 1870 to 1946.

They were so alike that they couldn't be distinguished from one another. However, Castor was mortal while Pollux inherited immortality from his father. Both of them were excellent horsemen and brave warriors. They loved each other and were inseparable. When Castor was killed in a battle Pollux felt so lonely, that he begged Zeus to allow him to die. Zeus permitted Pollux to share his immortality with his twin brother.

According to the mythology Zeus sometimes descended from Olympus to enter into nuptial relations with women who didn't belong to the realm of the gods. As a result of one such visit the twins Castor and Pollux were born to Zeus and the wife of the Spartan King, Tyndareus.

They were placed here between 1845 and 1846. These statues were cast in Berlin from a model by the sculptor Christian Daniel Rauch and presented by the Prussian King to Nicholas I.

The columns are made of polished granite from the town of Serdobol. These columns commemorate the feats of the Horse Guards Regiment in battle during the war against Napoleon.
