

Pavers sport

Pavers sport, yachting, sailing is an active water sport in which athletes compete using sailing equipment installed mainly on yachts. Sailing was most developed in those countries where this sport was conveniently practiced based on geographical location. Yachting originated in the Netherlands [1] in the XVI century. The word "jaght" (formed, probably, from "jagen" - "to drive", "to pursue") was first noted in the Dutch-Latin dictionary of 1599.

Sailing is originally a water sport, where competitions are held on ships or sports equipment (for example, boards) that move under the force of the wind. Such vessels are called yachts. But now sailing can be practiced not only in summer on the water, but also in winter on the ice. Conduct sailing competitions in the winter on the shells, put on skates or skis. Such yachts are called buaters.

The first sailing races were organized between the English courts - "tea clippers". Tea was then taken from India to England. The ship that came to England before all could sell the brought tea more than anyone.

The most prestigious sailing competitions among large yachts are considered to be the America's Cup competition. At these competitions, technology, large syndicates compete, and the winner of the Cup determines the class of yachts for the next cycle of the Cup. As a result of scientific, technical and technological research during the race for the America's Cup, many new technologies and materials have appeared, which are now successfully used in aerospace and other industries.

In the Olympic program, sailing competitions first appeared at the 1900 Summer Olympics in Paris and since then have been included in the program of each subsequent Games.
