Be Happy

How much do we know about happiness? What does a human need to be happy? Everyone answers this question in their own way but there also exists some objective data.

A lot of people are sure that wealth is an important part of happiness and that money can make you feel on top of the world. Actually, according to scientific research, money can't buy you satisfaction. It is just getting the bare necessities that gives you a sense of delight. Additional income can hardly raise your spirits.

Youth doesn't make you happy either. The same research shows that older people are more satisfied with their lives than the young. In fact, young people tend to have dark moods and feel blue more often than senior citizens.

A good education is a useful thing but, unfortunately, neither education nor a high IQ¹ is a key to happiness.

We can't be certain about marriage. Though the research shows that married people are generally happier than single, it is difficult to say if they become happier after getting married or are originally happier than those who stay single.

A good climate and plenty of sunshine have nothing to do with our emotions either.

So what helps us to look on the bright side? Scientists believe that among the facts capable of raising your spirits are religious beliefs, true friends and a good family. One of the conclusions that scientists make is that people who have them, achieve the highest level of happiness and seldom feel depressed.

From everything said above it is easy to make a conclusion that to be happy and content a person needs good social skills and support of other people.

1) Scientists say that

- a) money is the surest way to happiness
- b) money is the only way to happiness
- c) buying the bare necessities is a way to happiness
- d) buying the bare necessities can't make you happy

2) A high level of education ...

- a) is the best way to happiness
- b) is no way to happiness
- c) leads people to wealth
- d) helps to find the shortest way to happiness

3) The research shows that

- a) there are as many married people as single ones
- b) getting married is a sure way to happiness
- c) there are more happy people among married men and women than among single ones
- d) it is clear that marriage helps people to become happy

4) To be satisfied with their lives people

- a) should live in a good climate
- b) should have a lot of sunshine
- c) should have friends, a family or other people helping them
