1920s

- 1920s Dancing Bands
French Charleston Orchestra

- Prohibition of alcohol began in 1920, this led to an underground market for much sought after drinks and the creation of places like speakeasies.
- Speakeasies started out small, but as the Roaring Twenties came into its prime, speakeasies followed and expanded into clubs that featured musicians and dancers.

- Speakeasies weren't the only places that offered a party during the Jazz Age, there were private clubs, dance clubs, jazz clubs, and roadhouses. All were places where people could gather, listen to new music, and try out the latest dance crazes together.
- Dancing was a large part of popular culture and music during this decade and there were a number of iconic dances to emerge from these scenes. Dancing represented the carefree and excessive leisurely lifestyles that many had and tried to emulate during one of the first huge boom periods of American History.

- Nearly every town in the country had some form of dance band and a place to gather, making dance music some of the most widely heard and accepted music to come out of the 1920s. Dance music laid the foundation for what would become classic pop standards.

- Most dance music resembled what we would call Big Band today, but at the time it was considered Jazz and it had elements of the formerly popular Ragtime music.
- Late 20s were much more influenced by Jazz music

- Bix Beiderbecke – Riverboat Shuffle
(cover 1956)

- A third influential jazz musician of the decade was a white cornetist and pianist named Bix Beiderbecke.
- Beiderbecke's style contrasted with Armstrong and he is thought to have had an equal influence on the early jazz scene like Armstrong.
