

In fact Britains believe in young people of their country and they think that they will represent Britain in the 21 century. The Government cares much about every aspect of life of young people, including education, health, social security, law, environmental and national heritage. The main principle of britain's education policy is that every young person should have the opportunity to get a good basic education until the age of at least 16. After 16, young people stay at school or college and achieve more advanced educational qualifications or they take part in government supported training programmes to achieve specific vocational skills. It helps them to be prepared for adult life.

We know that parental influence at home is a key factor in the young person's life. It includes wide social environment at school and popular culture» influence.

It is a pity but only few young people attend youth clubs and organisations. Most of them are rather interested in activities that do not cost money and can be picked up with ease. Certainly, it means that a great deal of their time is spent with friends, cycling or skate-boarding.

Many teenagers try to find «Saturday jobs» as assistants in shops, caffis or restaurants. They need money and it is quite normal. There are very many things that young people want to buy as we know. Many young people are fond of sports. They go in for fitness or football that is encouraged through school and by a great many outside organisations. Outside school activities are darts, chess, bowling and other more social games.
