Colored cliffs of Zhangye Danksia in Gansu Province, China

The colored rocks are composed of red sandstones and conglomerates of the main Cretaceous period.

Scientists suggest that about 100 million years ago there was a huge body of water in these places, into which a great deal of silt was applied.

Li River, China

It begins in the Maoher mountains and flows into the Guangxi Zhuang district in China.

The river Li is charming at all times of the year and in any weather.

Tianji Mountains, China

Shrouded in mist, the mountain peaks of Tianji make an indelible impression, because to see something like this is impossible in any other corner of our planet. In the translation, the name of the mountains translates as "son of heaven", and, traditionally, such an epithet was called the Chinese emperors.

Hitachi National Seaside Park, Japan

Looking at the photo of the Hitachi Park, I want to understand that for the fluffy balls, similar to our tumbleweed, occupy huge territories.

This place is unlike any other in the country and even in the world

Glacial Lake Moraine, Canada

The water supply of the reservoir is mainly glacial, so its waters are crystal clear and very clean.

The highest water level here is observed from the middle to the end of June, after a long melting of snow in the surrounding mountains.
