

GLOBAL COOPERATION

Global cooperation is obviously defined as the act of all countries working together to accomplish global issues and missions. The missions and issues of the global cooperation are environment, poverty, war, diseases, extinct animal so on and so forth. To solve these issues, it requires a huge amount of supports and efforts from other countries due to the fact that almost all countries are confronting the same issues. As a result, global cooperation is fundamental.

Firstly, global cooperation is important because it offers more job opportunities to the people in the developing countries.

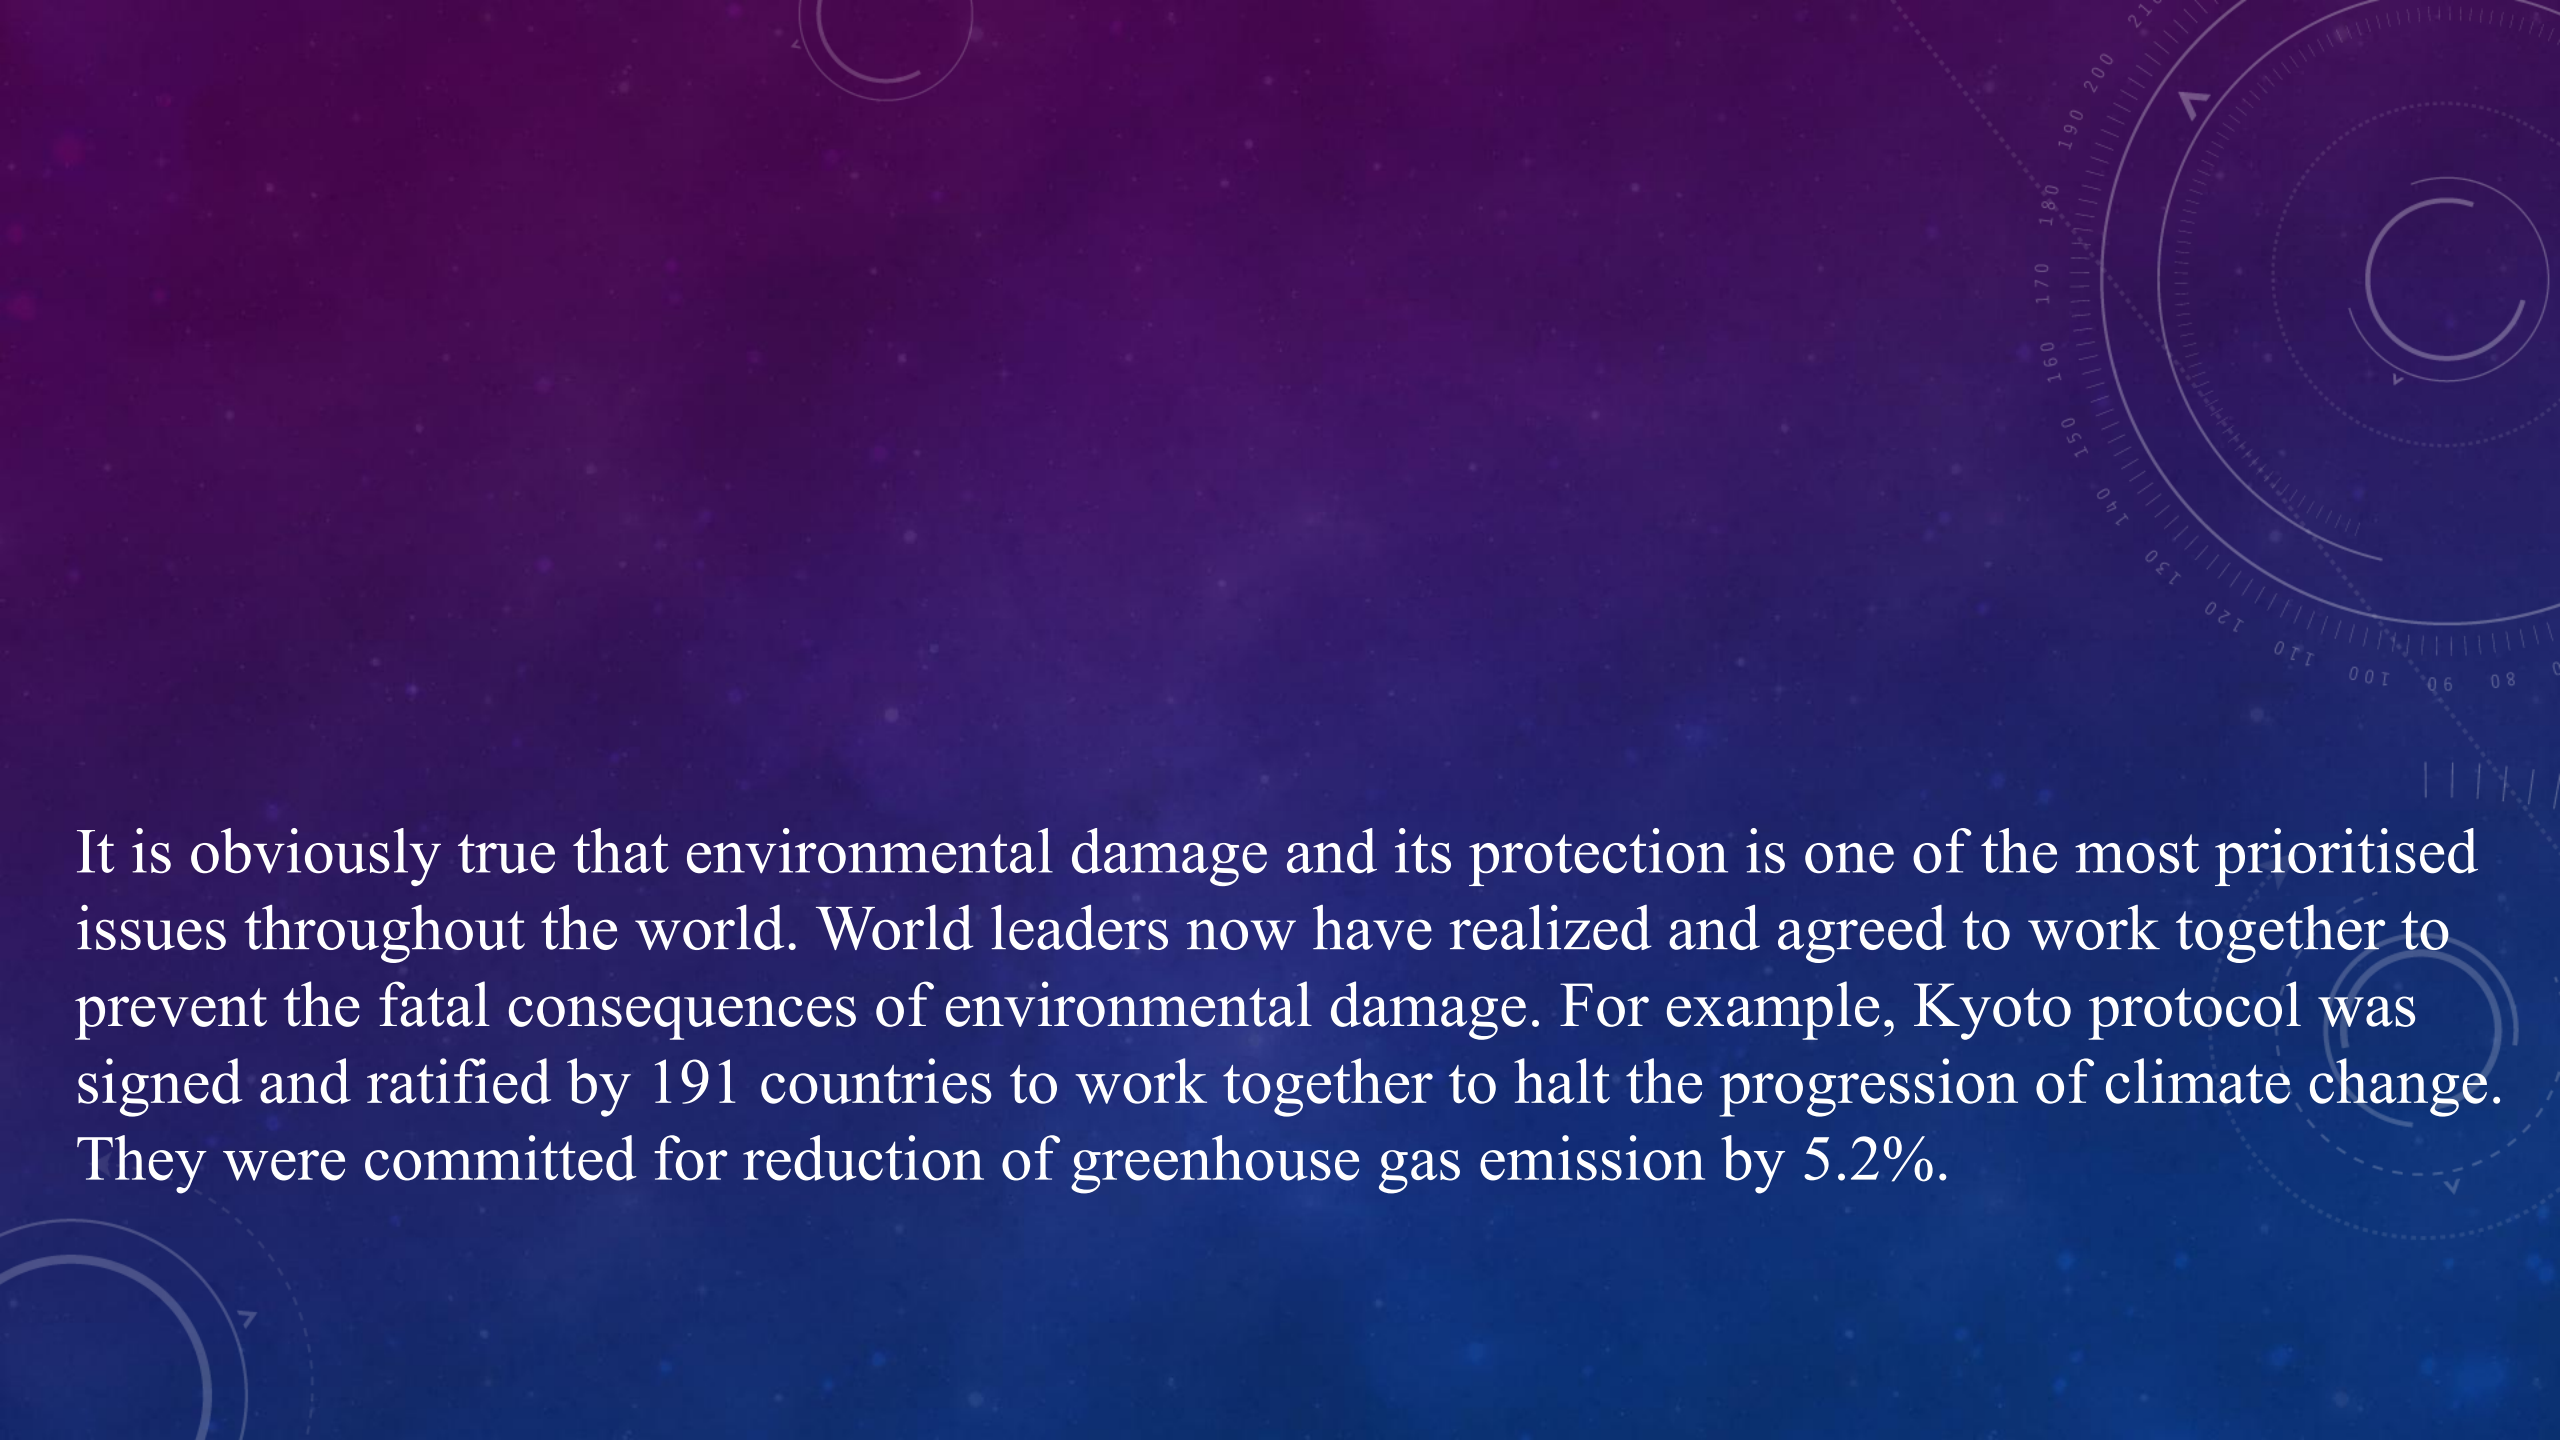

Secondly, the importance of international cooperation is to fight the diseases. There are a barrage of illnesses occurring have killed a great deal of people.

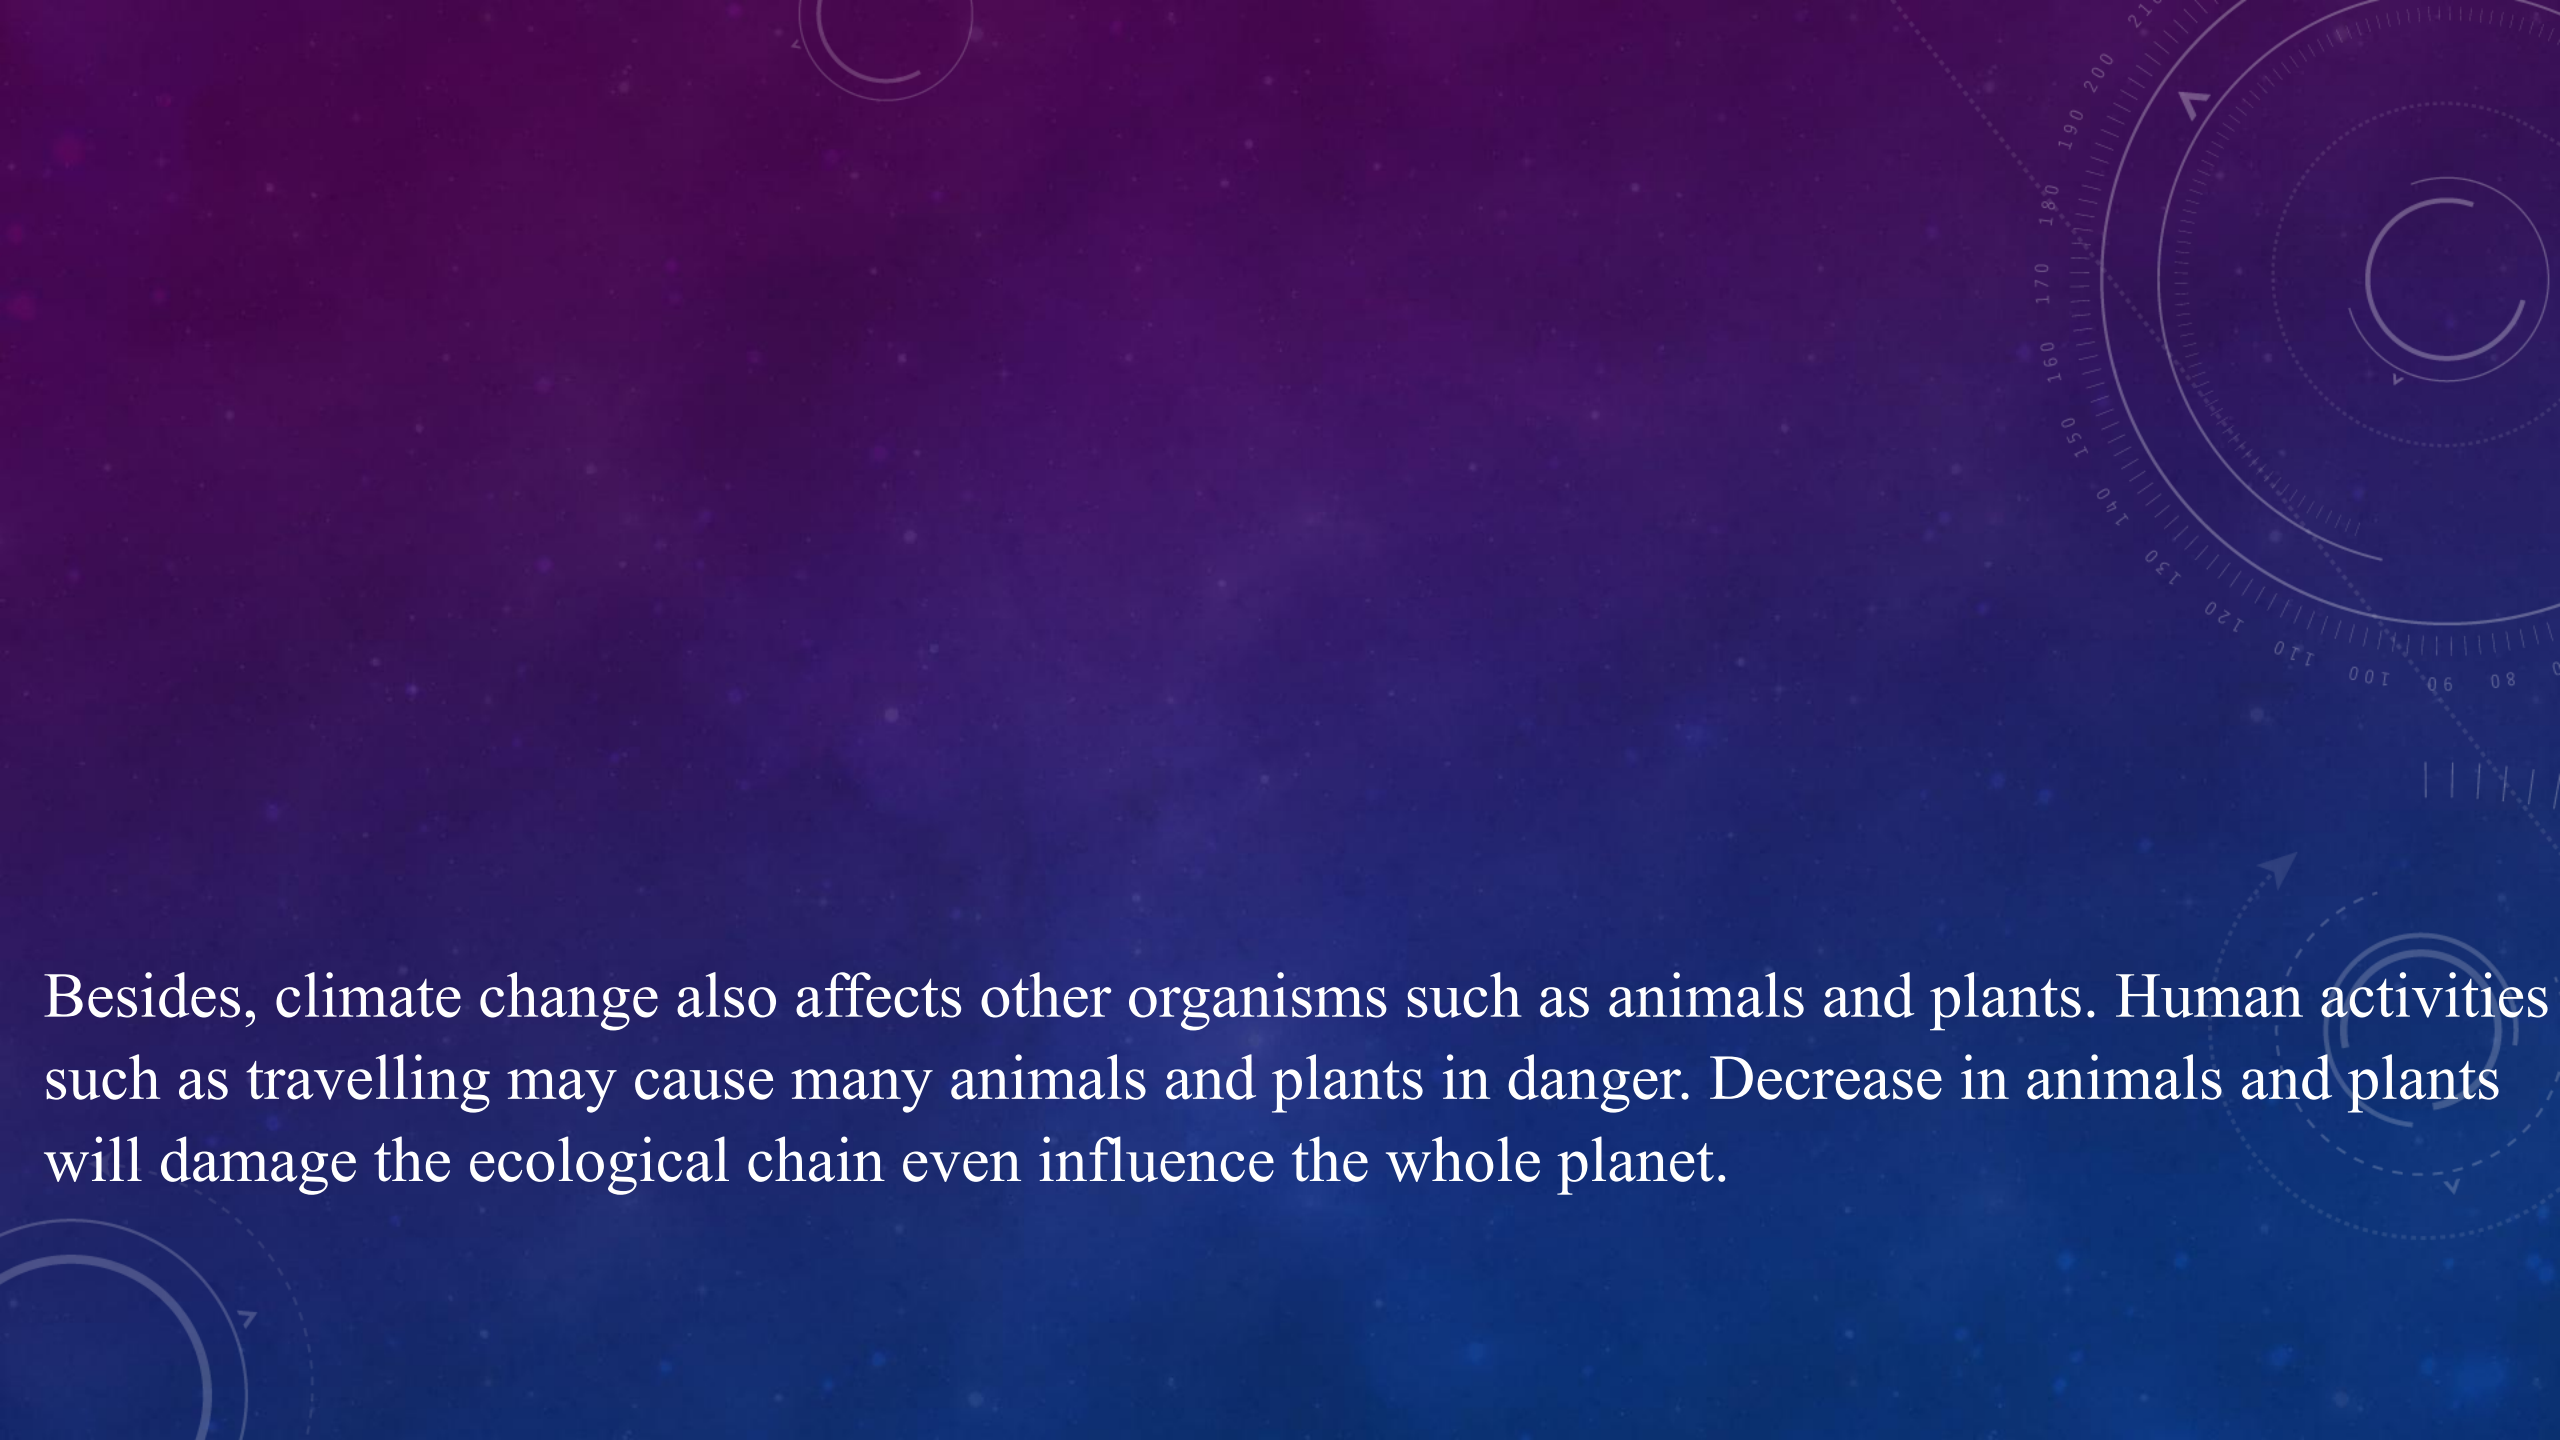

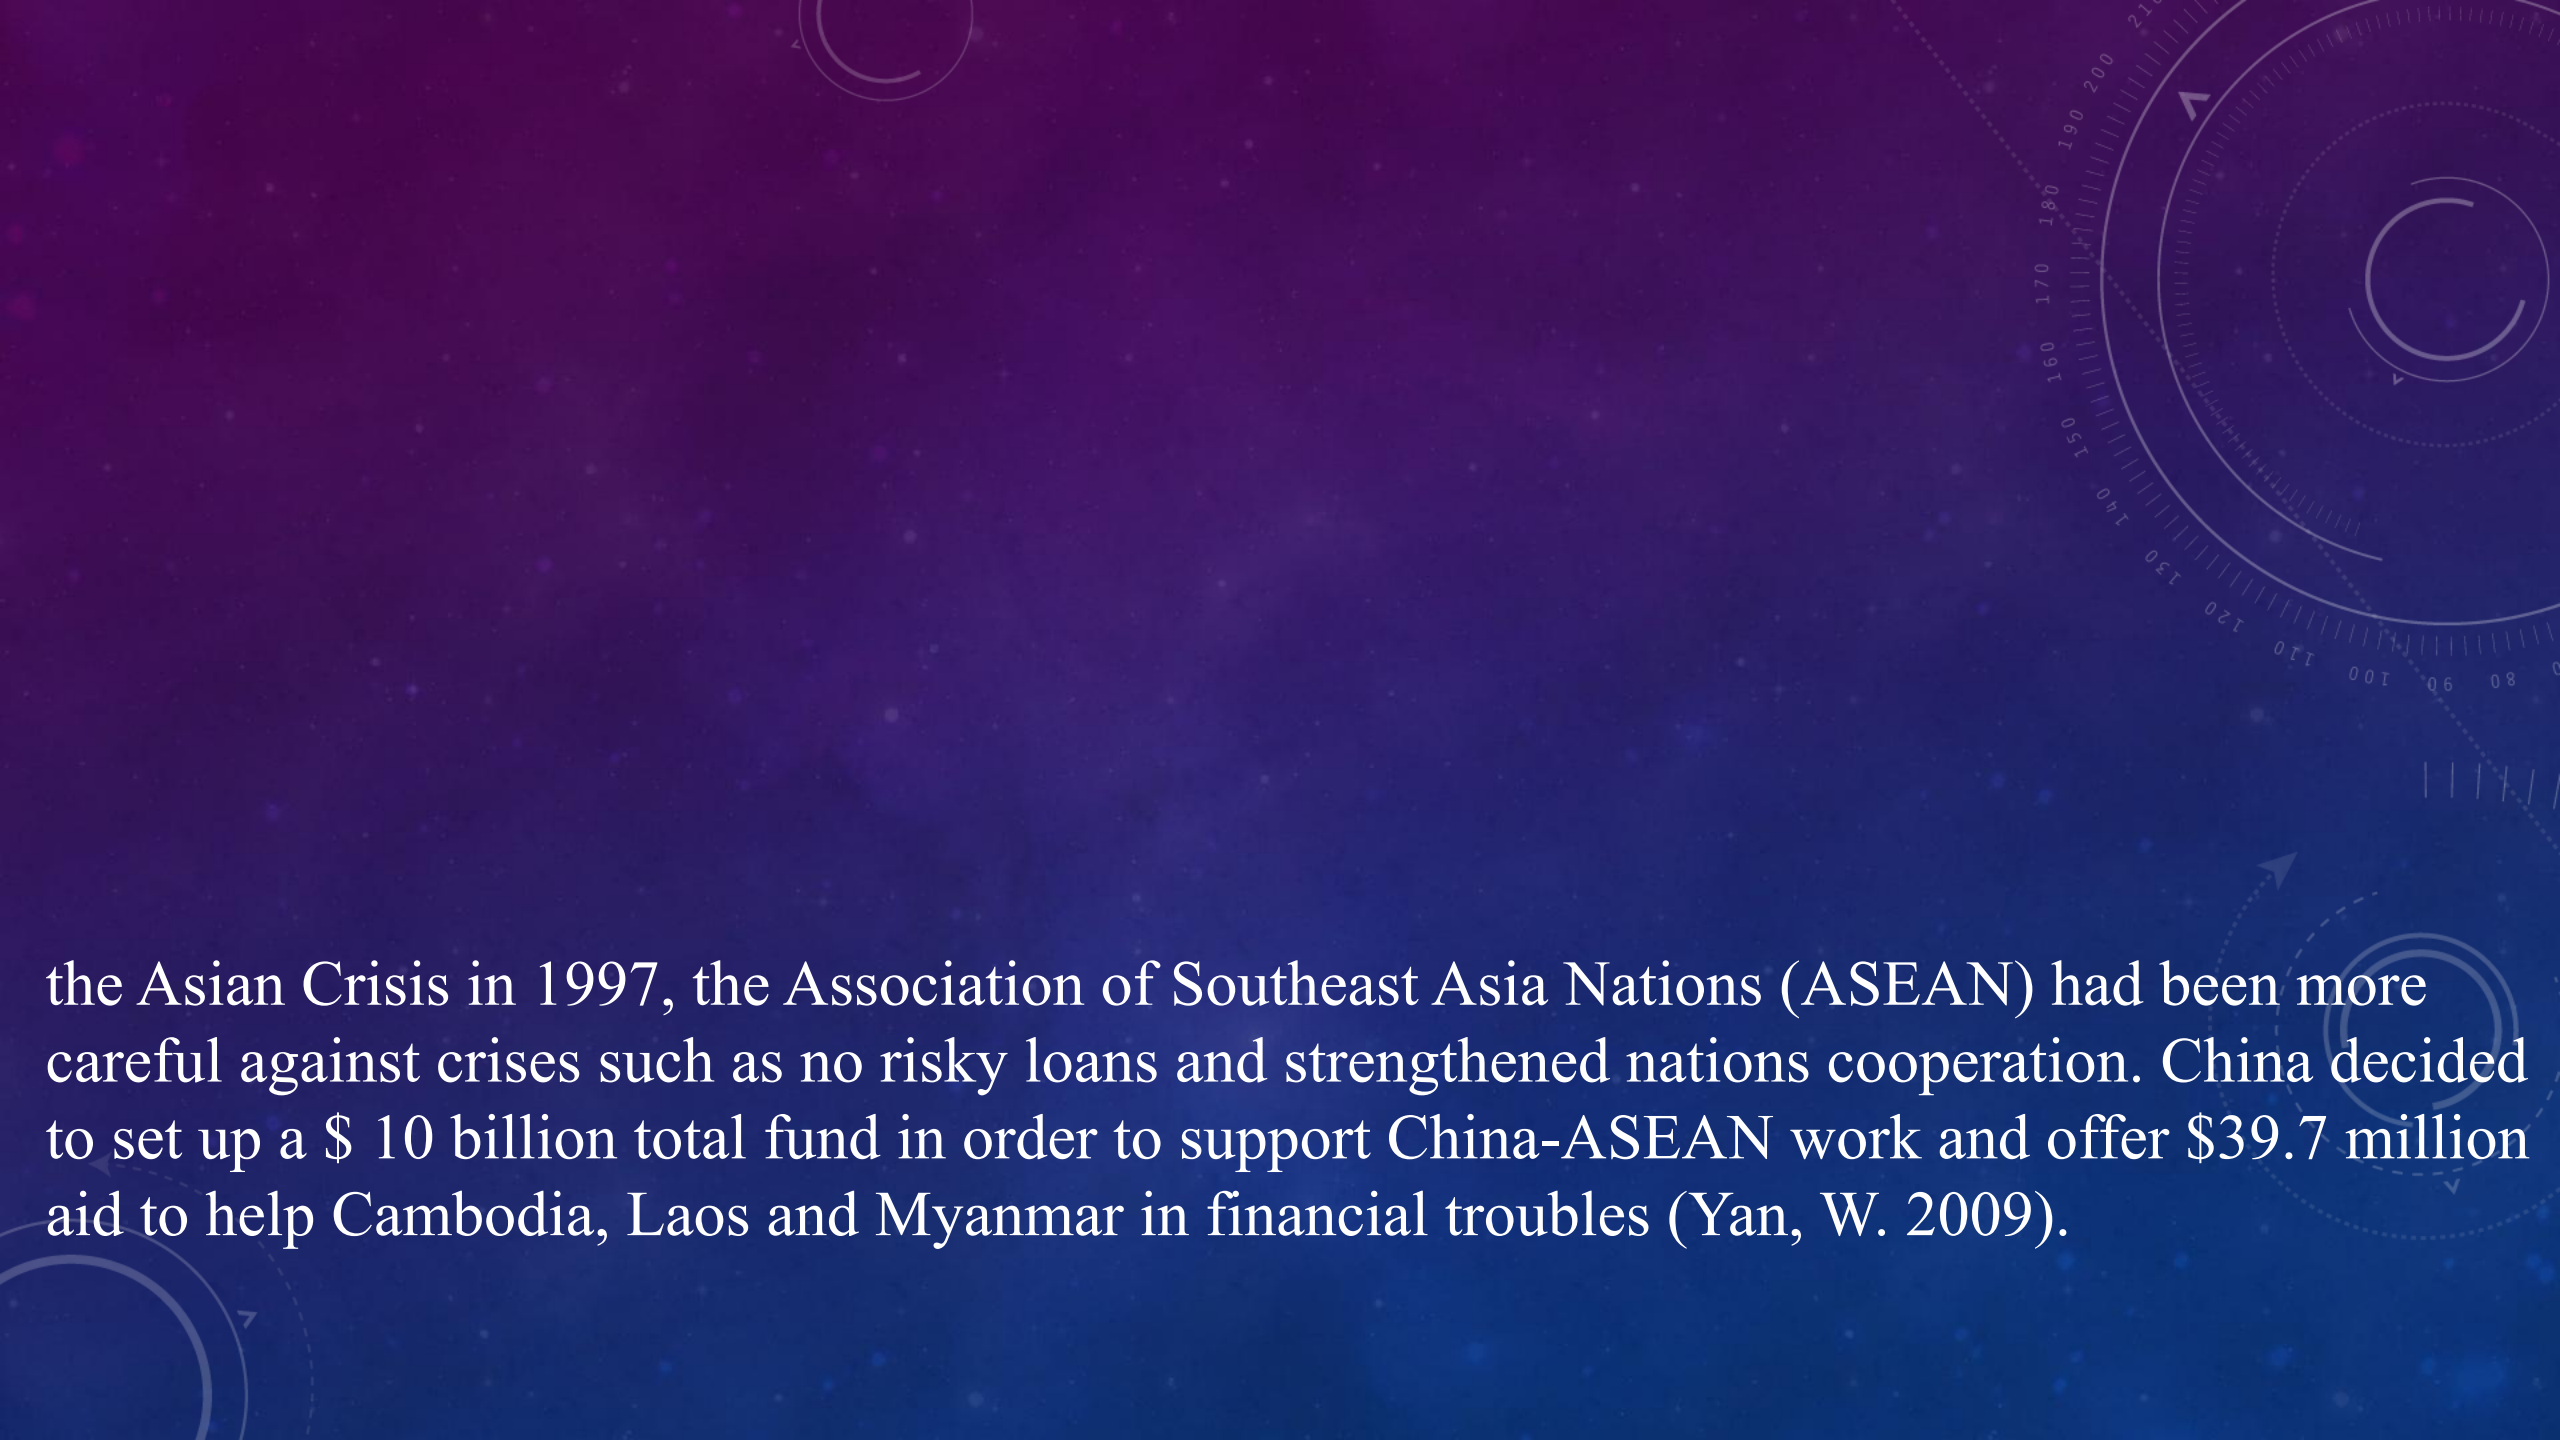

Last but not least, global cooperation is vital because it can improve the lifestyles of farmers in the provinces by creating fair trade system. Fair trade is also known as international trade which it can affect to the world economy.

It is obviously true that environmental damage and its protection is one of the most prioritised issues throughout the world. World leaders now have realized and agreed to work together to prevent the fatal consequences of environmental damage. For example, Kyoto protocol was signed and ratified by 191 countries to work together to halt the progression of climate change. They were committed for reduction of greenhouse gas emission by 5.2%.

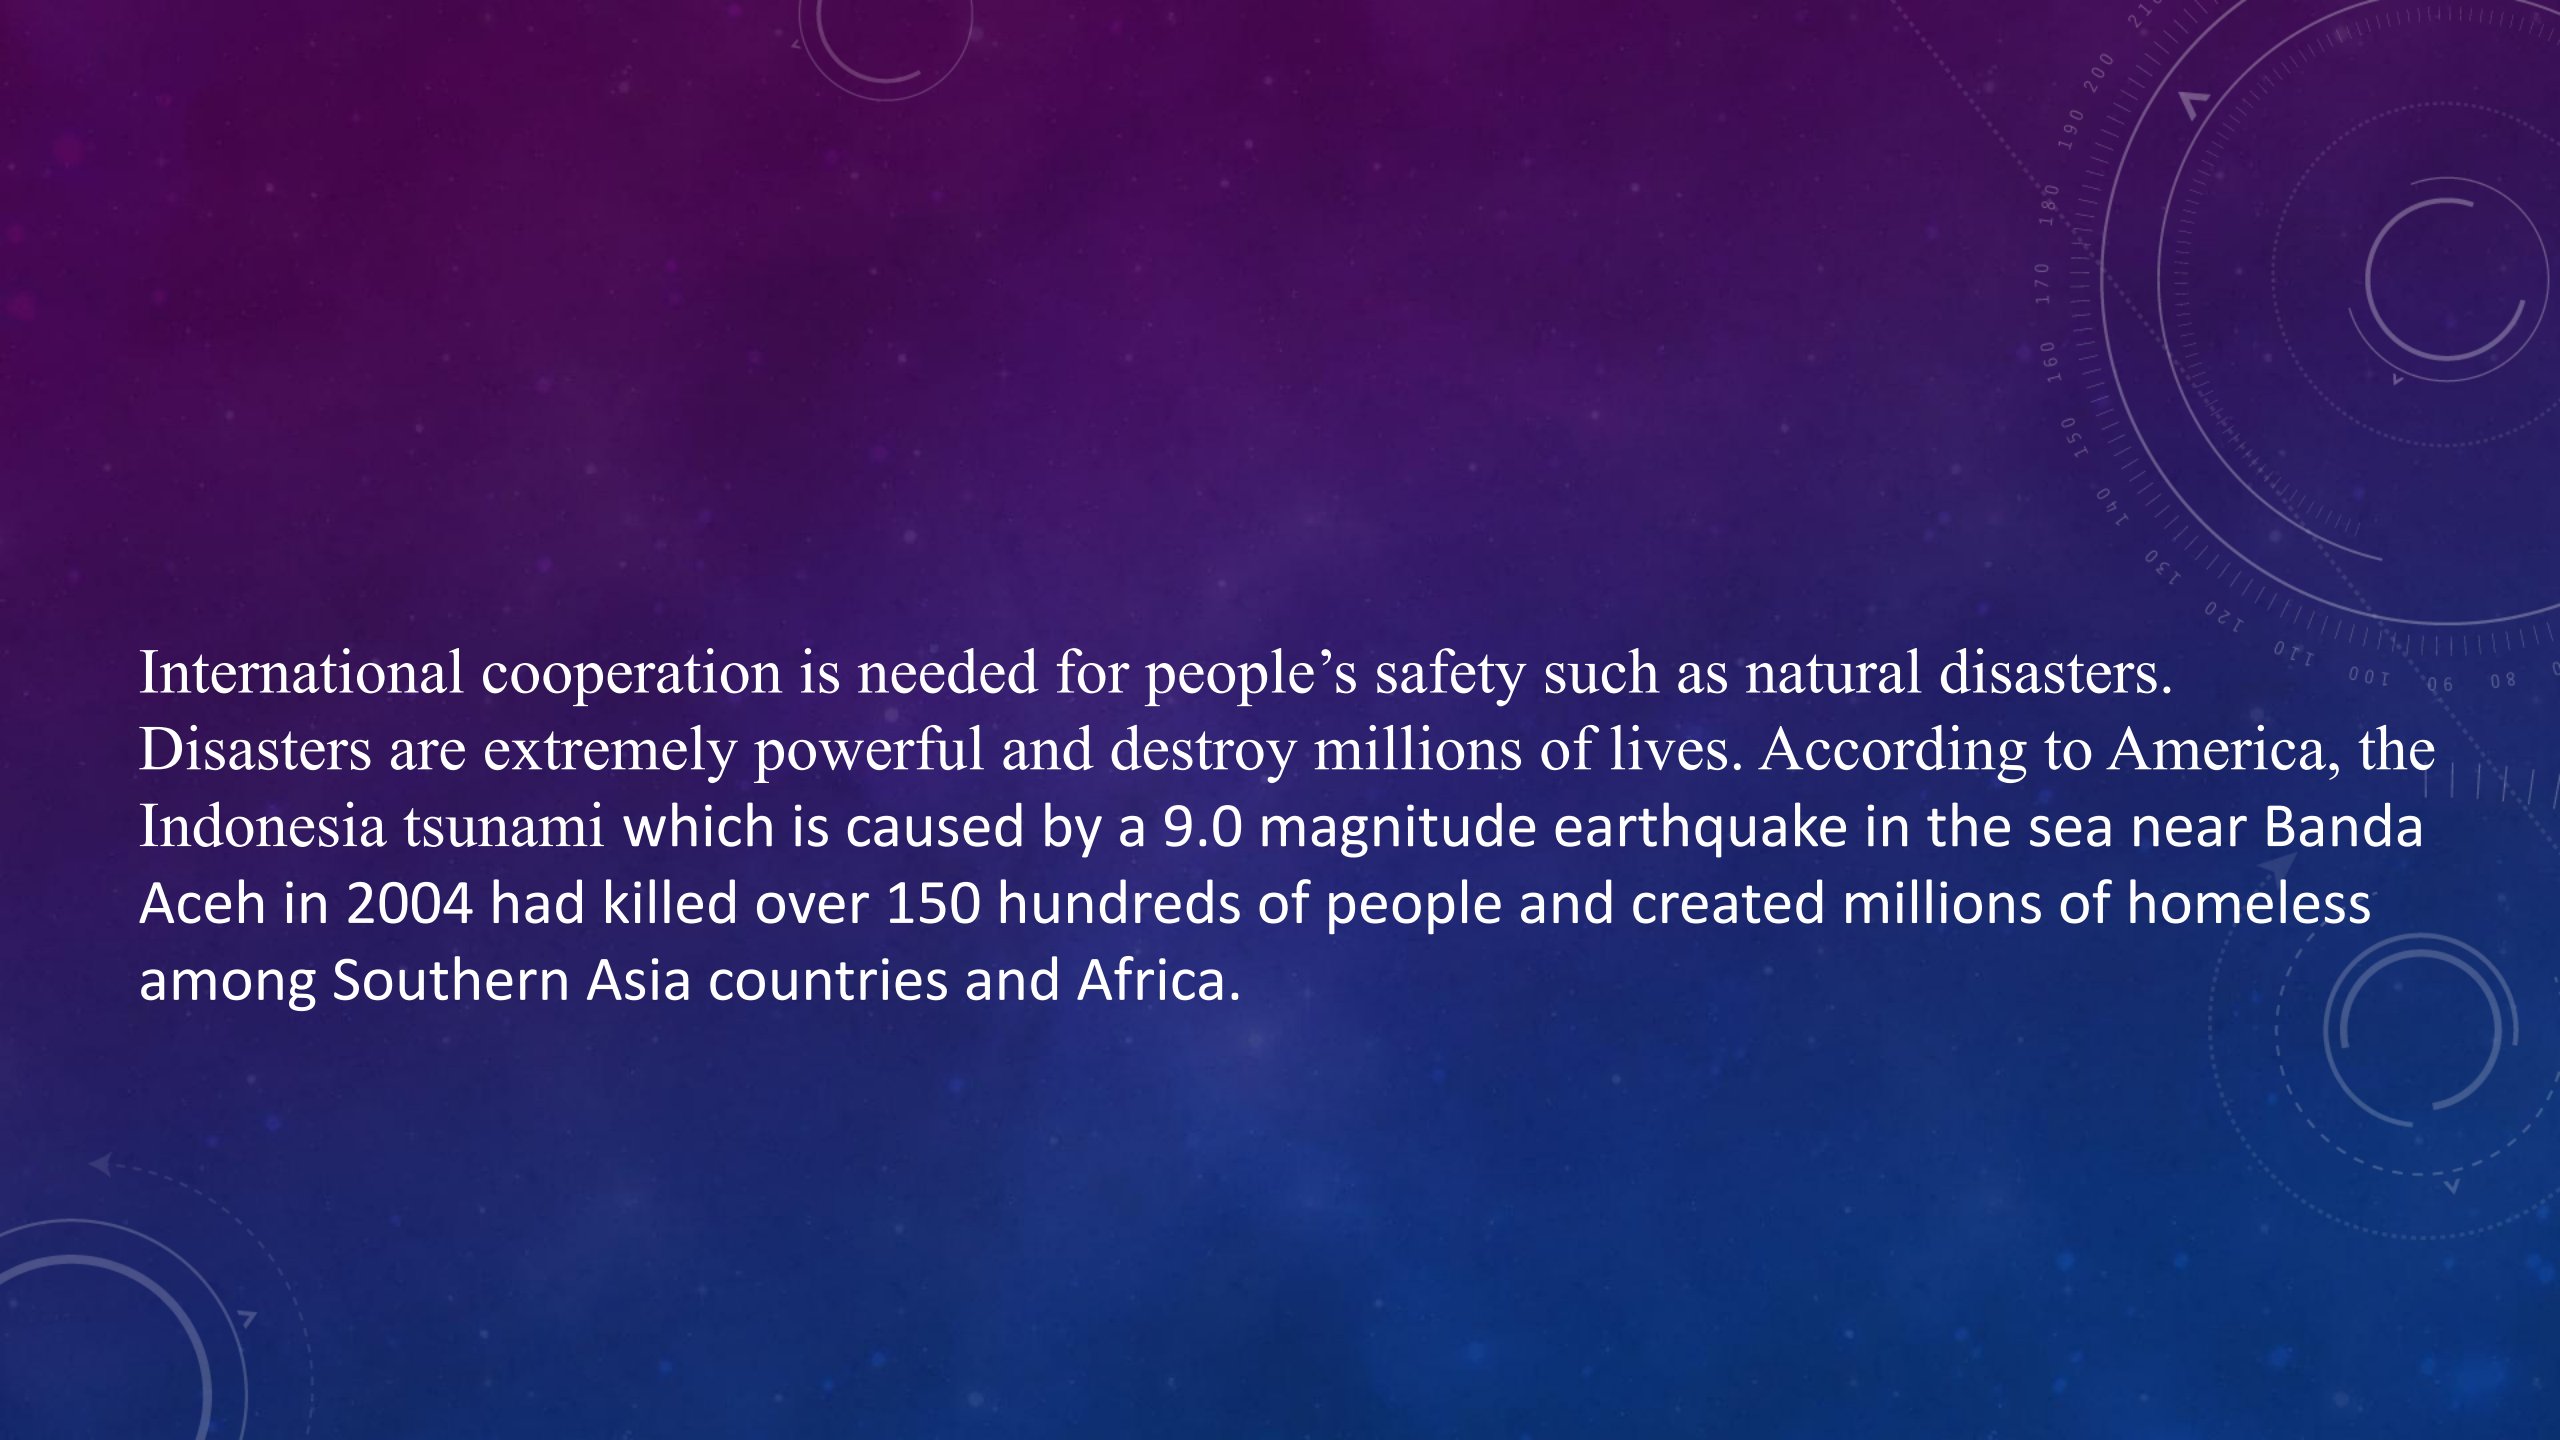

Besides, climate change also affects other organisms such as animals and plants. Human activities such as travelling may cause many animals and plants in danger. Decrease in animals and plants will damage the ecological chain even influence the whole planet.

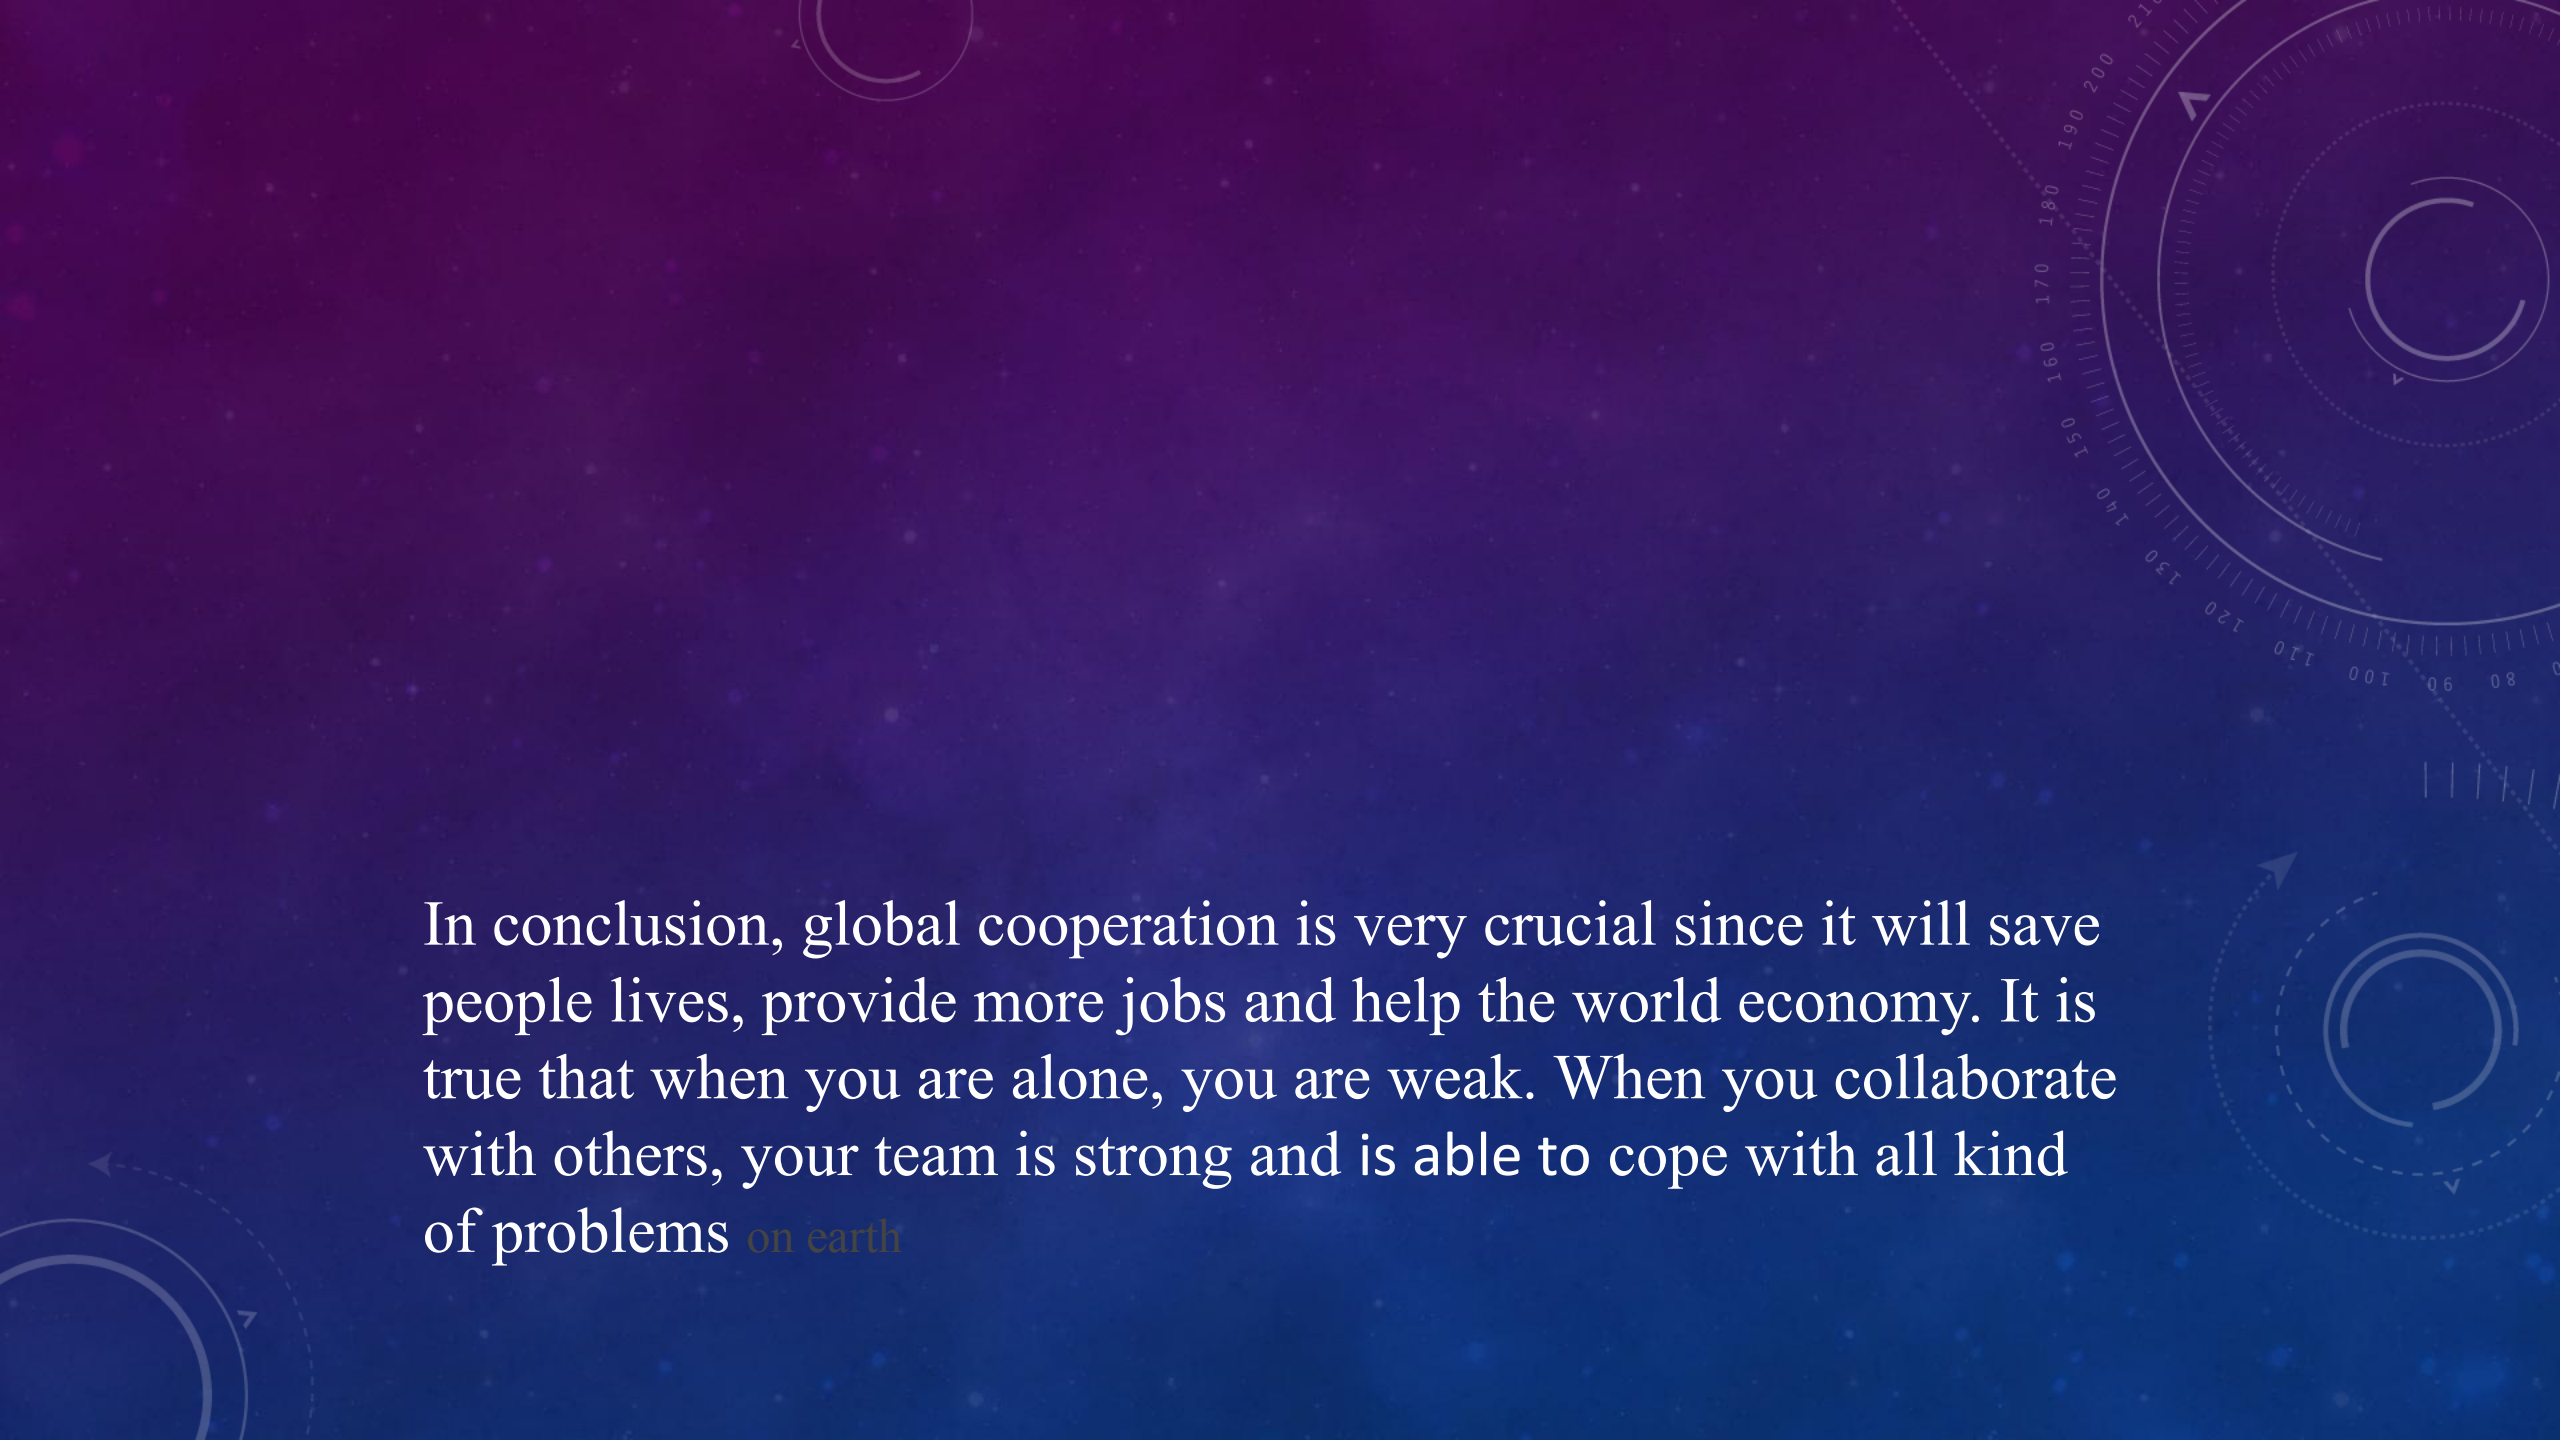

the Asian Crisis in 1997, the Association of Southeast Asia Nations (ASEAN) had been more careful against crises such as no risky loans and strengthened nations cooperation. China decided to set up a $ 10 billion total fund in order to support China-ASEAN work and offer $39.7 million aid to help Cambodia, Laos and Myanmar in financial troubles (Yan, W. 2009).

International cooperation is needed for people's safety such as natural disasters. Disasters are extremely powerful and destroy millions of lives. According to America, the Indonesia tsunami which is caused by a 9.0 magnitude earthquake in the sea near Banda Aceh in 2004 had killed over 150 hundreds of people and created millions of homeless among Southern Asia countries and Africa.

In conclusion, global cooperation is very crucial since it will save people lives, provide more jobs and help the world economy. It is true that when you are alone, you are weak. When you collaborate with others, your team is strong and is able to cope with all kind of problems on earth
