Medical myths

Reading in dim light makes your vision worse

Medical Myths are common beliefs, rarely based on facts

- Some people believe drinking eight glasses of water a day can bring good health, while reading in dim light damages eyesight. Others believe we only use 10 % of our brains or that eating turkey is really tiring. But some scientists say that these are actually “medical myths”. Some are absolutely untrue, while others are impossible to prove, the British Medical Journal reports.
- Scientists from the Indiana University School of Medicine studied medical literature to find facts for each myth. They found information dated to 1945 suggesting that healthy people should drink eight glasses of water each day. But they say there are no facts supporting that recommendation. Studies also show that most people get enough water drinking juice, milk and even coffee.
- The myth that people use only 10 per cent of the brain has been around for more than a century. Some people believe it came from Albert Einstein, although there are no facts to prove that. What the scientists did find were studies that show people use much more than 10 percent of their brains.

- As for reading in dim light, doctors say that it can cause eye discomfort. This uncomfortable effect goes along with the feeling of dryness, so it is difficult to focus, but it does not cause permanent damage, the authors say.
- What about eating turkey? Does it really make you especially tired? Perhaps the reason turkey has long been blamed for making people extra sleepy is because of eating too much of it on Thanksgiving. Studies show that eating any large meal can make you tired.
- It is widely known, that hospitals do not allow to use mobile phones near medical equipment. They started it in 1993 after Wall Street Journal told a story about electromagnetic waves and their effect on medical devices. But an Internet search could not find any cases of death caused by use of mobile phones in hospitals. They did find reports of less serious events, such as false alarms or incorrect medical diagnoses.
- Dr David Tovey, editor of Clinical Evidence journal, said: "The difficulty is it is often hard to prove that something is not true. On the other hand, if there are no facts, it doesn't mean there is no effect. Many of these "myths" are harmless. However, we are still finding facts that are contrary to what we know and expect."

Medical Myths. Task 3

2. How do medical myths originate?

Dig Deeper. Conjunctions

Correct Punctuation

Even native English speakers can have problems with punctuating conjunctions. The most typical question is to use or not to use a comma.

1. When only two words or phrases are joined by a conjunction, comma is not necessary.

We like banana and vanilla ice cream.

2. When three elements are in the list, however, you must use at least one comma.

He likes to play basketball, volleyball and rugby.

3. In lists, commas separate each element.

He ordered a salad, soup, lasagna and a desert.

4. When we join two clauses, a comma is required before the conjunction.

He passed his driving test, so his parents bought him a car.

She will walk, or she will ride her bicycle.

- We use and for

- We use or for

- We use but for

- We use because for

- We use so for

We use although for
