Americans place a high value on education. Universal access to quality education has been one of the nation's historic goals. In 1865 education was becoming available to all.

The American system of school education differs from the systems in other countries. The peculiar feature of American education is the absence of national administration. Each of the 50 states controls and directs its own school.

There are state public schools, private elementary schools and private secondary schools.

State public school

- Most students attend public schools. These schools are run by the government of a city. The citizens of the city pay taxes to pay for the school buildings, teachers' salaries and equipment and supplies for the schools. Public schools are usually large.

Private elementary school

- The second year at school is considered the first year of primary school and is referred to as first grade.
- American children start school at the age of five years. The first year at school is called kindergarten. It is required of all American children enrolled in the American education system.

Private secondary school

- Primary school most commonly consists of five years of education, referred to as first through fifth grades. Upon completion of fifth grade (the last year of primary school), American children enrolled in the American education system advance to secondary school.

Private and State Colleges and Universities

- Other colleges were founded in the next century, but all of them remained small schools for long periods.
- Private colleges and universities were established in various states. The first state university was the University of Virginia, founded in 1819.
- Higher education in the USA may be divided into two broad fields: liberal arts and professional. Each of these fields may be further subdivided into undergraduate and graduate levels.

Questions to the audience .

Would you like to study abroad?

What differences have you noticed with our education system ?

What kind of education system would you come up with?

In the end ,I would like to say that each education system has its pros and cons and directly depends on the country and the mentality of people living in this territory.
