

Project

on topic

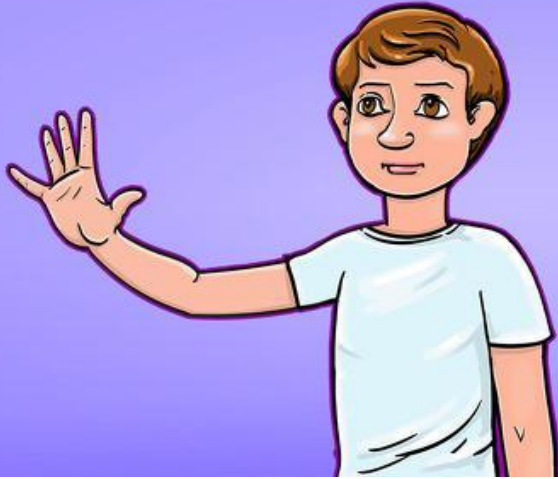

<Saying it without words
and distinctive peculiarities>

We use words to communicate with people, but we also use body language – particularly gestures and facial expressions. And different people have different body language

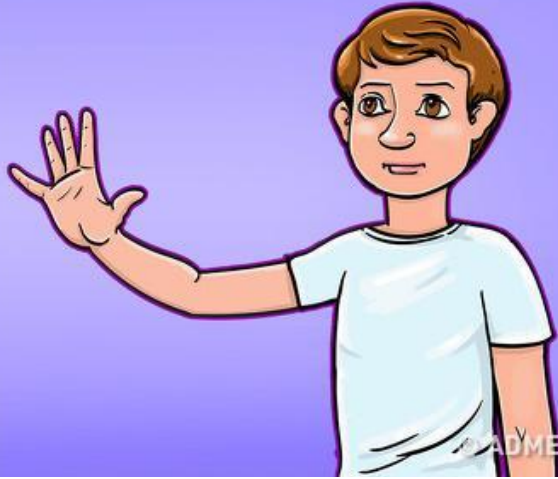

Older people in Britain usually shake hands when they meet for the first time, but young people don't do this very often. In France many people of all ages shake hands every time they see each – they say the French spend 20 minutes a day shaking hands!

In western cultures, young people and adults look each other in the eye during a conversation to show interest and trust, but in many Asian countries, it's rude to look people in the eye, especially a superior such as a teacher. In Britain and the United States it isn't polite to stare at strangers, but Indians often look long and thoughtfully at people they don't know.

Most countries
"Stop!"

Greece
"Go you!"

Most countries
"Come to me"

Philippines:
"Used in relation to animals"

Most countries
"I'm tired of you"

Italy
"I don't care"

Most countries
You are fool

Holland
"You are very smart"

Most countries:
An extremely rude gesture

Asian countries
Indication of the subjects

Most countries
"All right"

France
"He is complete zero!"

Most countries:
Rude gesture

Brazil
Good luck

